Implementation

dD+P pushes for the implementation of the US Green Building Council's LEED program where possible and works with its clients to find solutions to meet their goals and offer solutions that are more sustainable and environmentally friendly.

dD+P formed an internal "Green Team" that meets regularly to discuss issues that affect the design studio and seeks ways to promote more environmentally friendly practices both internally as well as through work it does with clients.

Excerpt from dD+P Company Policy Manual:

The studio encourages all staff to seek LEED Accreditation and to maintain their Continuing Education requirements. The LEED building certification system is the industry standard for sustainable building practices and is required by many city and state agencies. In order to maintain a competitive advantage, the firm supports and encourages staff to educate themselves on sustainable building practices and establish and maintain LEED Accreditation.

Measurement of outcomes

LEED Certification is currently the most reliable form of measurement in the building industry to determine the level of sustainability a building design achieves. LEED Certification is verified by an independent third party, based on metrics that are updated and reviewed by the building industry. dD+P currently has several projects seeking LEED certification.

In some instances, State or Federal Agencies, that dD+P does business with, will provide their own internal, sustainable design guidelines. These independent guidelines will be utilized to measure the building design against industry standards to evaluate performance in those cases.

In 2012, dD+P was commissioned by the Port Authority of New York/ New Jersey to review their internal Building Sustainability Guidelines and provide guidance on updating their guidelines to current standards and benchmarks. Future projects with the Port Authority will be required to meet the goals outlined in these new guidelines.
