Part II. Description of Actions

Over the past two years, the Global Coalition for Peace and Security has taken action on combating human trafficking, transnational organized crimes, violent extremism, community wellness, social justice and women's rights. GlobalCops engagement focused on working with stakeholders and policy makers to find lasting solutions to the scourge of terrorism, nuclear proliferation and ban of the world's most dangerous bombs. Our community outreach projects have also continued to focus on advocacy campaigns within communities here in the United States as we have intensified our commitment to mentorship among young people on the dangers of radicalization, substance abuse and violent extremism.

In meeting our targets, we have open frontiers of working relationships with civil society organizations, religious and civic groups, policy makers, social media companies, city governments, and the private sector to protect Human Rights and provide the resources necessary to capacitate targeted and vulnerable individuals. Particularly, we are preserving the undeniable rights of good governance and access to affordable and sustainable food, affordable healthcare, and the citizen's voice in government programs. Currently we are working with more than 68 local partners comprising of a network of thousands of citizens and NGO's to ensure the stability of the communities where we work, as well as 14 International partners.

Part III: Measurement of Outcomes

With our current pace of engagements and advocacy, we expect to reach immeasurable milestone over the course of the next two years and even beyond. Through international conferences, summits, capacity building workshops and field operations, we are reaching communities and individuals at a higher pace compared to before and the next two years will be more enduring.

To this end, we will be working with multilateral institutions, donor agencies, higher institutions, corporate partners who are interested in creating a more local impact in regards to the principles set forth by the UN Global Compact. The Global Coalition for Peace and Security will also continue to actively participate in Global Compact local events to share with others best practices around partnership development and network building.

We are particularly interested in connecting to more regional and sub-regional partners who want to improve their impact on society through impactful local partnerships and opportunities that may include capacity building, advocacy, mentorship and job placement.

The Global Coalition for Peace and Security will continue to share our progress and continued support through various channels and will also continue to promote our participation in UN Global Compact events.
