Sree.KM@timesgroup.com

Kozhikode: Mavoor grama panchayat authorities have initiated an interesting and ambitious experiment, to make their panchayat the first English-literate village.

The authorities have sought the support of a non-government organization to introduce English literacy training programme in their panchayat. A village where agriculture is the dominant source of livelihood, with a population of nearly 10,000 people, only a handful of them are proficient in English.

"In the digital era, everyone needs to have bank accounts for availing various government aids. However, most of the men and women in our panchayat are unable to understand the messages sent by banks or other firms owing to language barrier," said C Muneerath, president of the grama panchayat.

Total English Literacy programme, which aims to teach people to read and write in English will begin in March.

Around 90 volunteers will conduct the classes in 18 wards of the grama panchayat. Classes will be organized in each ward and 4-5 volunteers will be entrusted the charge of one ward.

At present, in the panchayat only school going children, college students and some well-employed persons understand English, said Muneerath. Lack of English skills has become a cause of concern after the digital revolution in banking.

Mobile phone and internet services are expected to open windows of opportunity for the residents once they get learn English.
